The Effect of an Interactive and Informative Commercially Available Recruitment Advertisement on Recruitment for Physician Assistant Schools. The University of Kansas School of Medicine has invested a large amount of time and money producing a recruitment advertisement that will appeal to potential applicants to their Physician Assistant program. The advertisement was validated by a market research firm, and its impact on recruitment at KUMC has been tracked. Recruitment was measured both before and after the advertisement's release via mass media and direct mail advertising. Although the advertising has been implemented since 2002, the annual starting class remained relatively stable at approximately 130 students per year. The findings show a higher than expected number of applicants prior to advertising release. This is followed by a precipitous decline in interested applicants. Compared to the number of interested applicants, however, the number of accepted applicants rose from 32 students prior to advertising release to a high of approximately 200 applicants after advertisement launch. The rise in applicant pool was not matched by a corresponding rise in admitted students. If the market research firm's validation hypothesis is correct, a price increase of approximately $70,000 to $80,000 per advertisement is required to reach the original findings. A single advertisement with a marketing focus may be insufficient to capture the entire student market. If each public university in the nation produces such advertisements, the potential for a two-tiered practice force is present. a DROP statement for this error. This is a full-body, compound move so it will engage the whole body. This is also an easy full-body, compound move so it will actually get done by the players. I like to run this three times all out, but I also liked to use this as a 'sprinter', only allowing players to rest for two seconds before hitting the next rep. The aim is to get players trying to run away from the ball, and using the strength they have developed from the explosive and strength-based basketball game to handle the contact. This also allows players to try out their new found strength in competition! For the purposes of this workout (and all of the workouts that follow) the aim is to focus on strength, body weight (body weight + basketball ball) development, and fatigue.
