20Apr2011 . Hotkey Appendix Application File .Potential of organically modified montmorillonite, bentonite and hectorite for adsorption of methylene blue from aqueous solutions. In this study, the removal of methylene blue (MB) dye from aqueous solution using three clay-based natural materials was examined. The physical, spectroscopic, thermal and morphological analyses were carried out. The adsorption capacities of the above materials for MB were tested at various dye concentration and pH values. Results indicate that the maximum removal of MB was observed for hectorite followed by montmorillonite and bentonite. The adsorption capacities of hectorite and montmorillonite decreased with increasing initial dye concentration. However, the removal efficiency of bentonite increased with the increase of dye concentration, showing a higher affinity to MB than montmorillonite and hectorite. The maximum removal efficiency of all the materials was attained at pH 4.6. Adsorption kinetic results show that the adsorption of MB onto hectorite and montmorillonite was fast, but was slow at pH 6.0 for bentonite. The adsorption of MB onto these materials followed the pseudo-second-order model better than the pseudo-first-order one. Thermodynamic parameters for the adsorption of MB onto hectorite, bentonite and montmorillonite were also determined. The results showed that the adsorption reactions were endothermic.
